Abstract

Internal audit is an important part of the corporate governance structure within an organization. The central objective of this study is to investigate factors determining internal audit quality in Ethiopian commercial banks. The study has adopted quantitative research approach by employing survey research as a strategy of inquiry. Survey for the quantitative strategy has been used through distributing self-administered questionnaires to 160 internal auditors' cross-sectional of 15 commercial banks. The Multiple Regression (OLS) has been employed to regress the data obtained via a structured questionnaire of a 5-point Likert scale. The implication of this paper go to inform the members of corporate governance (or board of directors, audit committee, internal auditors and external auditors) to use the findings in to account in their interactions to better equip internal audit function for their role in corporate governance effectiveness. The results of the study indicate that internal auditors in Ethiopian commercial banks believe the performance, competence and use of information technology by internal auditors as significant factors affecting internal audit quality. As a descriptive and regression result shows "performance" is the highest determinant factor of internal audit quality, followed by "competence" and "information technology" respectively. The study recommends that Ethiopian commercial banks must work to ensure the availability of the key factors to achieve the quality of internal audit function.

1. Introduction

The recent corporate failures have increased the significance of internal auditing. Concerning this issue, Schneider (2003) argued that the bankruptcies, financial irregularities and fraudulent activities that occurred in Enron, WorldCom and other firms have increased the need for corporate monitoring and concluded that external audit failures related to these events increase the role of internal auditing in corporate monitoring. Organization's management is accountable for establishing and maintaining effective internal control systems which help the management of the organization that effectively diminish the risks to organization's attainment of objectives. Management is charged with this responsibility on behalf of the organization's stockholders and is held liable for this responsibility by an oversight body (e.g. board of directors, audit committee, elected representatives).

Internal audit is an important part of the corporate governance structure within an organization. Corporate governance includes these oversight activities undertaken by the board of directors and audit committee to ensure the integrity of the financial reporting process (Public Oversight Board, 1993). Three monitoring mechanisms have been identified in the corporate governance literature. They are external auditing, internal auditing, and directorships (Anderson et al., 1993, Blue Ribbon Committee, 1999) as well as the audit committee Institute of Internal Auditors (IIA, 2003a, as cited in Matameh, 2011). An existence of well organized corporate governance (board of directors, audit committee, external auditing, and internal auditing) is one of the strongest means to monitor and promote good governance systems in an organization (Belay, 2007). As recognized by economists and finance specialists, the role of banks is essential for the development of an economy. In addition, commercial banks always play an essential role in the economic development of every country. The governance and performance of commercial banks is determinant for sustainable economic development. Therefore, this study aims to provide evidence on the question of whether the internal auditor's competence, objectivity, performance and access to information technology determine the internal audit quality.

An effective internal audit function is a significant player in two basic governance activities; monitoring of risks and providing assurance regarding controls. Furthermore, internal audit function plays a key role in compliance work and may also spend considerable time on consulting or operational-oriented work, with the objective of enhancing the organizations effectiveness and efficiency; and all these elements map directly in to organizational governance (Hermanson and Rittenberg, 2003). The existence of well-publicized articles on corporate failure around the world suggests weak corporate governance as being a major source of the failures. This suggests that auditors both internal and external, audit committee and board of directors may not properly discharge their professional and statutory responsibilities. Interestingly, a study by Smith (2010) acknowledges the critical role of internal auditors to improve the organizational governance in the U.S. In a more recent study by Sarens and Mohammad (2011) that aimed to investigate factors associated with the convergence of internal auditing toward best practices indicated that internal audit function in emerging countries converge more rapidly
